THE ROYAL ACADEMY, 1899.

INTRODUCTION.

It can scarcely be said that there is this year any great sign of activity in the studios. Painters as a class appear to have given way to a kind of timidity, and to have become more or less disinclined to tempt Fortune by launching out in new directions. They prefer to travel over ground which they have traversed before so often that they have no fear of missing any of their accustomed landmarks, and to keep themselves within bounds that secure them against the chance of wandering abroad into fields unknown, where the possibilities of failure are at least as great as the prospects of success. Experiment has, indeed, ceased for the moment to have any fascination for artistic workers. It promises no results that justify its dangers in the present condition of the art world, and it calls for more hopefulness and energy than the profession has seemed of late to possess. Necessarily the spread of such convictions has affected the character of the Academy exhibition. The collection of pictures which is gathered under the roof of Burlington House provides no surprises and few sensations; it follows the beaten track, and makes no pretence of hinting at unorthodox experiment. But if it is uninspired and without flashes of novelty, it is at least sound and honest in its respect for tradition. Thorough and sincere achievement, based upon knowledge acquired by well controlled study, is by no means lacking, and a very satisfactory standard of technical performance is maintained throughout. To the public, perhaps, which loves dramatic departures, and finds in them material for endless conversation, the show may seem unprofitable, and possibly unconvincing; but the close observer who looks beneath the surface will not so readily condemn it on the score of absence of interest. Studious and careful craftsmanship has for many minds a distinct fascination, and of this the Academy certainly presents many instances.

The chief honours of the year are due to the portrait-painters. Mr. Orchardson has rarely made so plain his right to rank among the greatest members of our native school who have devoted themselves to this branch of pictorial practice; Mr. Sargent, though he has often been more spectacular, has scarcely touched before the level of dignified reserve which he has reached with apparent ease in his portraits of Miss Jane Evans and Miss Octavia Hill; and Mr. Bramley, too, shows by one canvas that in this direction successes await him which will easily surpass those which he has made in the domain of painted melodrama.

Landscape of the best kind is fortunately plentiful enough, and some of the pictures which deal with the figure in the open air are of commanding importance. Mr. Lionel Smythe and Mr. Alfred East fully justify their recent admission within the Academy circle, and Mr. Napier Hemy relaxes none of that newly-found vigour which brought him also into the fold. Mr. David Murray and Mr. Leader still observe the traditions which have proved during past years completely to the taste of the public; but Mr. Waterlow has added to his earlier elegance a touch of robustness that augurs well for the development of his capacity. Mr. Tuke must be credited with having produced one of the best pictures of the year, a study of nude figures in sunlight. It is in motive and manner like others that he has exhibited, but it goes further, and asserts his convictions more definitely than anything which he has painted before.

The most remarkable of the few imaginative canvases in the exhibition are the work of the younger men. Mr. Byam Shaw's "Love, the Conqueror" and Mr. J. Young Hunter's "My Lady's Garden" may be taken as typical examples of the modern spirit, and as marking plainly the direction in which youthful fancy is disposed to tend. They have a purpose very unlike that which is perceptible in Mr. Abbey's illustrations to old ballads; and in their mediævalism of manner contrast obviously with his romantic inventions. Mr. Abbey, however, is not quite so well represented as in previous years; and as neither Mr. Waterhouse nor Mr. Watts are much in evidence, there is no chance of making any efficient comparison between the new school and the old. But at least it is evident that there are among the men who are coming to the front many who will be qualified to take the place of the veterans who may in the fulness of time fall out of the ranks.

Happily, to compensate for any want of energy which the painters may be credited with in their support of the Academy exhibition, the sculptors have never shown so much vitality or such readiness to strive after great results. In ideal work, portraiture, and decorative applications of the art, sculpture is year by year winning its way to a position of pre-eminent importance that contrasts strangely with its low estate a generation or so ago. It is the one power in the art world that seems irresistible, and its influence is daily becoming more convincing. Of this the evidence this spring is beyond dispute; and at a moment when many people are disposed to lament an apparent failure of the public to interest themselves in art matters, so striking a revival is extremely encouraging.

The Works of Charles Burton Barber.

Illustrated with Forty-one Plates and Portraits, and containing Introduction by HARRY FURNISS. Royal 4to, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

"CHARLES BURTON BARBER was an admirable painter of animals. He made dogs and cats an especial study, and his pictures of these animals in combination with children were often to be seen at the Royal Academy. The book should be a welcome addition to the adornment of the drawing-room table and to the nursery library. To children the pictures speak eloquently of the love which may subsist between themselves and the lower animals."—Scotsman.
